Man found guilty for murdering Potrero Hill dad, son

. By Examiner Staff Mar 22, 2007 Updated May 18, 2022

A man who gunned down a father and his infant son in late 2005 faces life in prison after he was found guilty in his second murder trial.

A jury of four men and eight women deliberated for nearly five days before finding Joseph Stevens, 23, guilty of first degree murder. In October 2005, Stevens crept up to a car parked in front of 43 Turner Terrace, in Potrero Hill, and unloaded a high-caliber assault weapon into the vehicle, where 22-year-old Dernae Wysinger, his son, Naemon Wysinger, 2, and the boy's 23-year-old mother sat. Bullets ripped through the family, killing the father and son. The mother was injured.

In a news conference following the guilty verdict Wednesday, San Francisco District Attorney Kamala Harris said Naemon was targeted as an act of revenge. Wysinger and Stevens had been feuding for more than a year, authorities said.

Stevens' first trial ended in a hung jury in early 2006 after one juror held out for an acquittal.

The second trial, which started in January and lasted approximately three months, included testimony from a new witness, for whom prosecutors had searched but were not able to locate during the first trial, prosecutor Marshall Khine said Wednesday. The new witness was able to identify Stevens as driving the getaway vehicle several days before the crime.
